MADE TO KEEP HIS WHISKERS

Even the Ruler of Great Austrian Empire Had to Submit to Powerful Opposition.

A little while ago, says the Vienna Figaro, the Emperor Francia Joseph intimated to his barber that it was his intention to have himself fully shaved "after the American fashion," as he expressed it, and that hereafter he would go smooth-faced. When this design was communicated to the Archduke Ferdinand he deemed it his duty to notify the court of this intention. Were the venerable chief of the house of Hapsburg to cause this long-established Austrian type of facial decoration to disappear what deplorable consequences would follow, for this new style would, out of deference to the emperor, be at once adopted by most of the officers of the army. Then there could be nothing less than the suppression of an effigy on postage stamps and photographs consecrated and popularized by a growth of more than sixty

The archdukes and the archduchesses, the grand marshal, the grand master of ceremonies, the grand of the empire, were called upon to present to the sovereign the consequences of his resolution. It would be nothing less than an overturning of all the traditions of the state.

But old men are obstinate. The emperor persisted in his resolution, and it was necessary to give the most potent reasons to conquer his resistance. So the court chaplain, who is a prelate of the pope, was called. Prancis Joseph yielded at last. He was made to comprehend that he should bend his will to the welfare of the empire, and the whiskers that frame in his imperial features will remain as an important part of his prestige.

NAPOLEON IN EXILE.

One hundred years ago Napoleon arrived at the Gulf of St. Raphael and embarked on the English frigate Undaunted, which was to carry him to the little island of Elbs, in the Mediterranean, to which he had been exiled by the victorious allies. His wife and son were at the same time leaving Rambouillet, where the Austrian emperor had come to get his daughter and take-her home with him. She started for Vienna, after sending assurances to Napoleon of her constant attachment, and the wish she felt to visit him soon with her son. But this wish was soon forgotten by Maria Louisa. After her return to Austria ber time was spent in the most frivolous occupations, and Napoleon's solicitations that she should join him were utterly disngarded.
